Another key aspect of a visit is to learn more about American Indian culture, a program headed by Native American, Travis Jackson, Jr., of Maskogee, Seminole and Cherokee Quchan descent.

"There was actually a tribe, the White Knives, that lived where the ranch is," said Jackson, "but they've been extinct for at least 200-300 years. My goal is not to focus on any particular Indian nation but to share the commonalities of the tribes prior to their assimilation into Christianity, such as the focus on the four directions of spirit, earth, water and air. We're all stewards of the land and that's why we're out here trying to help protect the horses, the land and all of God's creatures.

"I want the experience to be educational but fun. Western tribes use the drum – not fire – as a centerpiece of ceremony, and we'll be performing some Native American powwow dances. We'll also offer storytelling inside the tepees."

In addition to offering a unique experience for visitors, Pickens is supportive of our nation's veterans as well.

"We look forward to offering returning vets a chance to work with our ranch from May through September. They are highly trained people, used to working in the mountainous terrain of Afghanistan. This is something fun and great where they can put their skills to work in a very positive environment.

"We're trying to be all encompassing, to be educational, to be green and natural, but we're doing things in stages," continued Pickens. "Disneyland wasn't built in one day. Our dream and vision and tenacity will pull it off. We'll be one of the biggest tourist attractions in America."

"Madeleine is the visionary and we're the ones making it happen," said Nannini. "She's such a driven and determined person, it will be great to see it come to fruition."

"Everyone needs to come for a visit," said Jackson. "You've never seen the sky so bright out there at the ranch. When the lights go out, it's nothing but stars. I'd forgotten how beautiful the sky is. It makes you a healthier person to let go of the present day and go back in time. You feel young again. What drives me to be here is how well it makes me feel." □
